The present invention relates to a system for producing radiolucent high-density elements in which a radiolucent substrate material having a density greater than unity is impregnated with a radiopaque composition, the density of the substrate material being less than that of the radiopaque composition, so that, when viewed in cross-section, the radiopaque composition is visible. The invention further relates to a method of making the system. The radiolucent high-density elements find particular utility in the field of orthopedic medicine for the production of inlays, onlays, crowns, bridges, and other prosthetic devices. Various techniques have been developed for making prosthetic devices. For example, in the medical field, restorations such as inlays, onlays, crowns, bridges, and other prosthetic devices are made from gold, porcelain, other metal alloys, polymer materials, and other suitable materials. The procedures for making such dental prosthetic devices and the apparatus used in making them are well known. For example, many types of apparatus and methods are known in which a mold or master is prepared by a technician and used by a dentist to make a mold of a patient's dental preparation in which a dental prosthetic device is to be fabricated. By way of example, such apparatus and methods are described in U.S. Pat. Nos. 5,438,769 and 4,621,601. In order to make such dental prosthetic devices, materials such as polysulfides are used for making
