Assembly and dynamics of binary colloidal systems containing non-thermal interfacial layers. We study a binary hard-sphere mixture (HSM) in the presence of a dispersed non-thermal interfacial layer (NTL) for colloidal and soft-matter systems. We argue that the formation of the amphiphilic layers in this system should not be a clear-cut process and so we develop a general theoretical framework to characterize the HSM-NTL system. We apply our theoretical approach to study the influence of the dispersity and the width of the interfacial layers on the density profiles of the layers and on the interfacial concentration profiles. First we predict the formation of a thick interfacial layer in the binary mixture. This is then validated by both the prediction and the self-consistent mean-field picture of the thermodynamics of the mixture. We show that the HTL is more stable for larger widths of the interfacial layers. Second, we consider a family of density-shifting systems in which the HTL forms a non-
