Mutant SOD1 expression alters microglial activation and neuronal cell death in the humanized transgenic mouse model of amyotrophic lateral sclerosis. In order to investigate the potential consequences of mutant CuZn superoxide dismutase (SOD1) expression in human neurons and microglia in vivo, a humanized transgenic mouse model was used. Since microglia are the first immunocompetent cells to contact a disease-carrying neuron, they contribute to motor neuron disease in the transgenic mouse model. In addition, the fact that mice containing some point mutations in the human SOD1 gene develop a neurodegenerative disorder that resembles human amyotrophic lateral sclerosis (ALS) suggests that human SOD1 may also cause disease in these animals. In the present study, we have established that progressive motor neuron loss and muscle wasting develop in the heterozygous humanized transgenic mouse line 621V, a partial human SOD1 mutant transgene model of familial ALS. In contrast to the expression of mutant human SOD1 in muscles, there was no gross immunoreactivity in mouse spinal cord motor neurons from 621V mice and no effects on the in vivo metabolism of mouse spinal cord neurons. In contrast, however, immune-mediated microglial activation was evident in 621V mouse motor neurons and in transgene-expressing microglia. Furthermore, lumbar spinal cord motor neurons from 621V mice exhibited a higher rate of apoptotic cell death than those from wild-type or age-matched humanized transgenic mouse lines. Our findings indicate that ectopic expression of mutant

A message from COCA-CAL via Dave Murray-Salisbury, We're not a flock of sheep, and we don't want to be as we depend on our livelihoods and the well-being of the animals we raise. With that in mind, we have decided to step away from our contract slaughter and sell only certified organic poultry to our customers. We're committed to doing the right thing for our birds and our customers — something that is in the best interest of animals and people. Consumers can be confident in the quality and safety of our organic product, as well as the integrity and independence of our certified organic poultry farmers. This is our decision, and we are proud to be a part of the certified organic poultry movement. Thank you, Dave and staff. * * * We are gravely disappointed to hear that COCA-CAL has changed direction, in the face of growing consumer demand. The industry-wide message has been that people want organic products. The upshot: This is a real blow to those wanting to buy organic, which are now going to find it almost impossible to get their hands on our product. This is a terrible decision — one that flies in the face of both the spirit and the letter of organic standards. The logic of selling only certified organic poultry to customers is that you
