Mutators are caused by mutation that change the code in certain genes and make the affected viruses resistant to treatment. Interrupting the viral life cycle is the traditional treatment. Avirulent Newcastle disease viruses (NDVs), which are unable to induce cytopathic effect in chicken embryo fibroblast (CEF) cell culture, can be generated by replacing the gene of an essential viral protein with the gene of a foreign protein. The foreign protein can act as an antigenic determinant without inducing an immune response in the bird. It is a technology that has revolutionized the field of avian medicine. Given the high mortality rate of Newcastle disease, the generation of attenuated NDVs could possibly have enormous implications for poultry health. Most mutagenic drugs target the viral polymerase or its immediate substrate, so the phenomenon of drug resistance occurs frequently. The g-6-MMP inhibitors selectively inhibit the mutated strains of mutagens, thus increasing the cure rate of the mutagenic drugs. The g-6-MMP inhibitors inhibit the mutated strains of mutagens, thereby increasing the cure rate of the mutagenic drugs. Because of this, it is possible to use lower doses of g-6-MMP inhibitors for the therapy of avian infectious diseases and thereby the cost of therapy may be reduced. Furthermore, the high concentration of the g-6-MMP inhibitor can prolong the effective period of b7e8fdf5c8
