The potential use of Gd-DTPA chelates as MR cholangiographic agents was assessed in rats. Male Sprague Dawley rats were administered a dose of 1 ml/kg Gd-DTPA by a peripheral vein. MR was performed with a 1.5 T Philips Intera MR unit. The resultant images were processed to obtain an enhancement curve, which was compared with the curve obtained after intravenous Gd-DTPA administration to rats. As a control for this study a set of rat livers, which had been perfused with a 1% Evans blue solution, was imaged. Gd-DTPA administration resulted in significant enhancement of the liver tissue, demonstrating a concentration of about 50 microM gadolinium chelates in the hepatic parenchyma. A set of normal liver sections (n = 8) demonstrated a significant decrease in the liver/muscle enhancement ratio from 1.34 +/- 0.13 to 1.18 +/- 0.09, p < 0.03. Gd-DTPA results in greater enhancement of the liver than is achieved with the gadolinium chelate concentration currently used in clinical practice. While the value of this study as a comparative trial in humans is not clear, the data does confirm that Gd-DTPA is capable of increasing the contrast produced by the liver p f988f36e3a
