It's a weird fact for me, but I've been using Photoshop for around 18 years. You know what? I don't even know how to use the damn thing. It's been a while since I've been able to make use of it as efficiently as I used to. I don't blame Adobe for creating Photoshop; they don't expect most people to use it. But I have high hopes that the new version of Photoshop Elements masters desktop publishing. That would be an interesting shift in company policy. Furthermore, I believe that Lightroom was really interesting for people who used to edit RAW files with software like Adobe Camera Raw. It was designed to work with raw files that are still to be processed by other RAW editing software. The tag file format it employs, the LRAC files, are specially developed for Lightroom. Red eye can be removed effectively with the Adjustment tool. Moving an adjustment's control up or down will affect the radius of the effect. You can choose to either change the radius of a lower level effect at a later time, or to have the effect affecting the entirety of the image at once. Once you apply an effect, you are presented with a stacked strip of the effect(s) that were previously applied. Simply pull this bar out, then click the image preview icon to apply the effect to that specific area of the image separately. An excellent image retouching feature is the Content-Aware Fill tool. It is very quick to apply gradient maps to specific areas of the image, as well as to apply a celebrity like filter to a specific area. To apply the new adjustments or effects, simply click the image preview icon.
