“However, on the DNG for the Lightroom 5.2, the daily snapshot feature works in two ways. With the Lightroom picking all the photos from the connected camera and thus making a project, it then builds a DNG with all the photos. If you want to add a reviewer on the project in the process, you can do so. If you want to continue adding photos, then you can go back to the project and add more photos without the DNG being built.” “The latest CC update includes some new features: the possibility to create and manage an interactive backup of a document using a “snapshot” plug-in, an improved “Day to Day” functionality which creates a set of daily screenshots based on a user preferences, the compatibility with iCloud for the desktop application, a new version of “My Artboard” and a new template catalog. The update also contains some bug fixes and improvements in the printing chapter. “Photoshop CC adds the ability to create and manage an interactive back up of a document using a “snapshot” plug-in, an improved “day to day” functionality which creates a set of daily screenshots based on a user preferences, the compatibility with iCloud for the desktop application, a new version of “My artboard” and a new template catalog. This is a feature that was introduced first with Lightroom 4 in April 2012. You can already use Photoshop for review as well. If there’s one very practical benefit of the new Lightroom 5 with the Share for Review feature, is it will help educate users on the Photoshop CS6 document (psd) file format. While the file format is theoretically well-documented on Adobe’s website, one does run into problems knowing all the file format options that are different (as a consequence of certain changes to the file format), In addition to mastering the option-level details. With the new Share for Review feature, users can now interact with reviewers regardless of what software tools they use. Lightroom and Photoshop share similar file formats so it makes sense that this functionality was first validated and extended to Lightroom. I love the idea of being able to review a photoshop file directly in Photoshop! It really removes the pain of having to open a jpeg in Photoshop, then get back to Photoshop to review something in the same file. The problem with Lightroom alone is file limitations (I have 25 GB of free space currently and my Lightroom 5 catalog is already at the 2 GB limit). This allows users to search and sort by columns on the GoTo grid, which can be located in the review panel. Only one reviewer can interact with the file at a time.

If you’re thinking of selling your work online, you need to make sure you’re using the right graphics design software. If what you offer is digital product and such, you need to have the tools needed to design your product. Adobe Photoshop is the most trusted and one of the best graphical software with almost everything you need to design, mimic, or manipulate your content. Use things like tools to make changes to images (cropping, resizing, etc.). Also, use tools to create vector graphics (a project with shapes instead of pixels as a source). What tools should I use?

If you’re working in a pre-designed image, you can use Photoshop tools to add watermarks, edit, or manipulate the image by using can-do tools like filters and adjustment layers, like brightness and contrast. You can also add elements like logos, text, and borders to your image. You can add the borders if you’re going to use the image for a website. The final step with the image is also using the design software’s layers to add multiple designs or templates. As the design is layered, you then apply the layers to the image. A lot of you need to have a solid understanding of CMYK and ensure that when you design that it reflects your brand in the end result. Just using RGB can make it appear a bit washed out at times and thus you need to make sure that you are designing appropriately to get the desired effect. Be sure to know your brand guidelines before you hit those brushes up.
