First off, and most importantly, Photoshop is a digital imaging software suite, first sold in 1990 and now owned by Adobe (formerly Aldus). It is primarily considered to be a replacement for the Mac OS 9's venerable PhotoShop, a program that's still popular with photographers and graphic artists due to its standalone ability to do cool things with RAW images. Since the days of Java 1.0, Photoshop has followed a shrink-wrapped development model. You buy an annual subscription to Photoshop CC to use Photoshop itself, but you must buy the bundled software tools that allow you to edit any files within the Adobe Creative Cloud ecosystem. I think this is a unique program because you can literally use this app to transform the color, style, or texture of any photo within seconds. I think this could be a game changer and definitely a product that will improve our society quality of life because it could improve the life of every photographer. I anticipate photoshop cameras to become a household product. e3d0a04c9c
